Conclusions from example 1.
When writing an IELTS essay, you must:
- adhere to the established number of words 250, not less;
- unequivocally state the idea in the whole essay, logically build the answer;
- to connect ideas with each other with the help of words;
- use a variety of vocabulary;
- choose the right words and phrases;
- avoid grammatical and punctual errors;
- use complex sentences.

Conclusions from example 2.
In IELTS Writing you should:
to rephrase the words of the theme in the introduction, not to rewrite the theme of the essay word for word in the introductory part to use synonyms, but leave the meaning as in the task;

write conclusions (2-3 sentences), which will summarize the main idea of the essay;

clearly structure the text, which will help the reader to quickly focus on the arguments proposed by you;

use words-bundles deliberately in order to create an answer as a whole;

Accurately select vocabulary, idiomatic expressions.

In the beginning was the word ...
What is considered a word? If "run" is a verb, then is it a separate word "run"? What about different forms - "ran", "runs", "running"? Or words derived from the same root, for example, "runner", "runnable", "runaway"? How to count how many words are in English and do compound words, for example, "man-o'-war", "man-hour", "man of God", count as one word or several?

Another problem: what is English? The word veal, borrowed from French in the 14th century, looks quite English. Slightly less - "spaghetti", which came from Italian in the 19th century. What about the Vietnamese pho soup, which has become popular just now? Or the Chinese dish "dim sum"? Or words that are used in the Singaporean dialect of English?

Moreover, the question itself, how many words are in English, is not quite correct, since it is based on the assumptions that words are objects that someone creates and which are stored in dictionaries. Both of these prerequisites are wrong. Words that exist only in oral speech, but not in print, do not fall into the dictionaries.
